Directions : Read the following passage and choose the correct answers from the series (1), (2), (3) & (4) and darken the right option against the questions (96-100).

Man's meddling with nature, chemical effluents, nuclear waste, acid rain and ever increasing presence of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere have resulted in the greatest ecological crisis known to mankind. Ecology has been defined as the study of organism in relation to their environment. This covers the whole of organic life, plants including fungi, animals including microbes and man. Then there is the environment itself, which includes not only the animate organism that populate the biosphere but also the inanimate forces operating in nature. Though ecology covers all species of life, it is man who is disturbing the ecological system, there by bringing about the Ecological crisis, a term in frequent use in the seventies and eighties.

Man has to exploit natural system for his survival. When he clears virgin land to plant crops he is unbalancing the existing natural system. In the eco-system all species of life- man, plant and animal- are interlinked with one another. Interference with one species will have serious repercussions on others. Man is over-exploiting the natural and mineral resources and if we continue to squander our resources then a shortage of one or the other may stare us in the face.

However, man's consciousness has been aroused very strongly about the need for environmental protection and ecological preservation in recent years. The people are raising the banner of protest against the dumping of waste pollutants and industrial effluents. 'Green' movement came into existence in US, Europe and Australia. In India Chipko movement has gained popularity. Environmentalists under the banner of 'Green' won 28 seats in West German Parliamentary election in 1983 and 'Green Peace', the environmental protests group, maintained its pressure on governments to ensure adequate protection to life on the earth. In the seventh plan adequate funds have been provided for ecology and environment.
